"We are one cinema who have never depended on Holly-wood money to be who we are. We've always been powerful because of our audience base," said Johar. According to Johar, in the context of India, the entry of studios—whether Warner, Disney, Fox—has

ployed in high positions. You really have to love the movies to make the movies. You can't just take someone from a business background and put them in charge of making movies," he observed.

Even in the West, he pointed out, the studio heads are people who have been film students or have been associated with films in other ways. "Filmmaking is a business, but this is also acreative industry. You have to strike the bal-be empowered. Writers have to be empowered. Our problem is that we want to pay the actor a lot of money and we want to pay the director a lot of money, but no one wants to pay the writer, whereas the writer is the most important resource in a film. No director can go beyond a poor screen-play. You can correct it, you can probably make it a little better, but no one can make it a great film."
