

Google looks beyond maps to chart the interior world in 3-D

San Francisco, May 12: Google already maps the world, but the internet giant has bigger plans for its next location-based technology.

The Alphabet unit wants to digitally map the interiors of buildings in 3-D down to a resolution of a few inches, and make money in virtual reality along the way through a project named Tango.

The company plans a big expansion of the technology this year and ultimately wants to make it ubiquitous, according to a person familiar with the situation. Job postings and recent updates to Tango's developer software show steps toward this ambitious goal. Google will showcase progress at its I/O developer conference near its Silicon Valley headquarters May 18 to 20.

Tango packs cameras and depth sensors along with other software into Android smartphones and tablets. Fire up the application and point the device at a space and it starts in images and depth information to recreate the environment on the screen and locates itself within that new digital realm.

Google hopes Tango will support a system for independent developers to create new virtual reality applications and services. Video games could have characters that hide behind real-life furniture. A museum could show 3-D animations when you walk past an exhibit. A grocery store could highlight sale items and guide shoppers to the right shelf.

Unlike most emerging virtual reality systems, Tango doesn't need external equipment to recreate the world digitally. And unlike Google Maps it can figure out the details of a space without additional data sources.

"Tango is the indoor extension of their outdoor mapping platform," said Lex Dreiser, a virtual reality developer who builds Tango applications. Tango started in a Google research lab more than two years ago, but the company is trying to take it mainstream this year. It's going into new smart phones from Intel and Lenovo Group and the software has been updated to let it easily run on more devices.

And there are signs Google is working on the most important challenge: Making Tango 3-D maps shareable so the company can someday patch them together into a single, detailed digital representation of many of the world's buildings, rooms and the stuff inside them.

Google Maps is one of Google's most successful services, used by more than a billion people every month. It's stretched into other popular Google services, like Gmail, Calendar and Photos.

With more detailed maps, Google could build new advertising and location-based services into its products. It could also offer these capabilities to outside developers, letting them create more powerful applications for its Android operating system.

"If Tango could digitize every single physical commerce place, then all of a sudden Google has an exponential opportunity to place very relevant contextual physical advertising in every space," said Nathan Pettyjohn, CEO of Aisle11, a mobile commerce and location company that has built applications for Walgreens Boots Alliance and Toys R Us. "It literally gives me goose bumps talking about it."
